

Hello...

THE PAST WEEK has been a big one for major league talent. First the Oscars finally gave Leonardo DiCaprio the Academy Award he's deserved since he was first nominated back in 1993 for What's Eating Gilbert

Grape?. Then Adele played the first date of her massive, 105-date 2016 world tour in Belfast, with a cup of tea in one hand and the 11,000-strong crowd in the palm of the other. And now comes the return of Jake Bugg, the Nottingham guitar hero who made his name four years ago as a mouthy teen.

Jake's first record bagged him a massive Glastonbury slot. His second, produced by Rick Rubin, tanked in comparison. Now at 22-years-old, he's all grown up and preparing the release of his third album, 'On My One', which sees him having a go at hip-hop and embracing a 1970s pop sound. It's not out until June, but we've scored another massive exclusive with Bugg's first interview in over a year, and he's on fighting but friendly form; having a dig at former touring buddy Noel Gallagher ("His last album is pretty crap, innit?"), refuting tabloid rumours and pondering the make-or-break aspect of his new album. Welcome back, Jake.

WE'RE HEADLINING!

Felix: "It's our first big one. It feels good because, when we were finishing our last album 'Marks To Prove It', we said the best situation would be if we ended up headlining somewhere like Latitude. This'll be the only English festival we do this year, so it'll be a special one."

2 BRITISH SEA POWER WILL BE UNPREDICTABLE

"I don't think there's a week that goes by where I don't listen to something by them. I always recommend seeing them 'cos you never know what's going to happen. I've seen them try

ROOTS MANUVA WILL BE A COMPLETE GENIUS

"His new record is so brilliant and dark. When we saw him recently, he'd got strings involved and live instrumentation, so it's kind of back to the way he used to do things a few years ago. And, again, with Roots Manuva you don't always know what's going to happen with the show, so it's always worth seeing it. The music's lasted so well. He's a true pioneer and genius songwriter."

4 IT'S A CASE OF TRANQUILITY VS CHAOS

"I like festivals these days where during the day you can walk around and it's a really familyorientated, 'nice' place to be. There's loads of little things buzzing around you can go and see. But then when it becomes night, it becomes chaos and there's a really different energy."

5 AND IT'S A MUSIC LOVER'S PARADISE

"It seems like a hand-picked bill. A lot of the time you can get bills that look quite similar, but I'm not sure if you will get a line-up like this one anywhere else in England."

RECEIPTE TY AND IN YOUR FACE

The Oscars and me

HY WOULD

you watch an Oscar-

film unless you're mad enough to purposely experience feelings? Bleh. I'm not interested in catching those. I cried just watching Chris Rock's opening monologue – partly because I'd found an illegal stream of The 88th Academy Awards that kept freezing – and yes, I always tune in for the ceremony. Eighty million people saw it this year, unable to wait to find out if we all still had the same number of Oscars as Leonardo DiCaprio.

I hadn't seen any of the movies, but I think I could give some solid reviews based on what was broadcast from Los Angeles' Dolby Theatre on the night.

Brie Larson won

Best Actress for Room, which was also up for Best Picture. I find it odd that 'Brie' is the only crossover cheese name. Have these eager parents not tasted Camembert? Halloumi? I recognised her straight away as Amy Schumer's sister in Trainwreck. She was lovely in that, but intentionally humourless. I have little time for sincerity. Room is about a kidnapped and brutalised woman who spends 24/7 locked in a small space with her young son. Take away the forced confinement, that's the life story of every new mother in Britain. I don't think I spoke to anyone apart from my daughter for the first two years of her life. Violet speaks to me in her sleep. And I can hear her because she rests with both legs across my body and one tiny hand on my face. Her speech picks up speed and verbosity come morning, at which time she's also mobile so follows me around the flat. It's basically Room. (I haven't seen Room.)

The Martian stars Matt Damon as an idiot who goes to Mars on purpose. If the Oscars are racist, I'm space-ist. I will remain unsympathetic to whatever happens outside this planet until someone can tell me what's at the bottom of the ocean. This film was better when it was called Castawav. Tom Hanks was too busy to notice he'd been ripped off because he was making Bridge Of Spies with Steven Spielberg. Oh good, a war movie! If it's about Russian spies, vou can count me out. The Soviets lost more people in WWII than all the other nations combined. I don't need to know what they were up to during the Cold War either. When I need Tom Hanks to upset me, I'll watch his cameo in Carly Rae Jepsen's 'I Really Like You' video.

I've heard rumours that in The Revenant, Leonardo DiCaprio gets raped by a bear. I fantasise a phone call where his agent is like, 'We're going to get you that Oscar, Leo. But you've gotta do something for me, champ,' and Leo's like, 'Anything.' The agent blankly goes, 'YOU. Are going to be RAPED. By a BEAR.' Leo absorbs this for a minute. Silence. Then he explodes with 'SHOW ME THE HONEY!!!" while leaping around his mansion. (I have not seen The Revenant.)

Spotlight won Best Picture. It's all about child abuse. I'll see you at the cinema when Trainwreck 2 comes out.

And another thing...

PEOPLE ARE NUTS. I GOT my boobs 3/4 out for the NME Awards and was featured in the Mail Online. 'DON'T READ THE COMMENTS,' my mother said. Here are some of the best ones: 'Big gob but I wouldn't be worrying about that when I'm wiping it on the curtains.' WHAT CURTAINS? 'If she was lobotomised, she'd make the perfect wife.' NOT AS FUN AS IT SOUNDS. 'Bit desperate for a guy these days.' YES, HE'S IN LA. 'Ugly inside and out.'

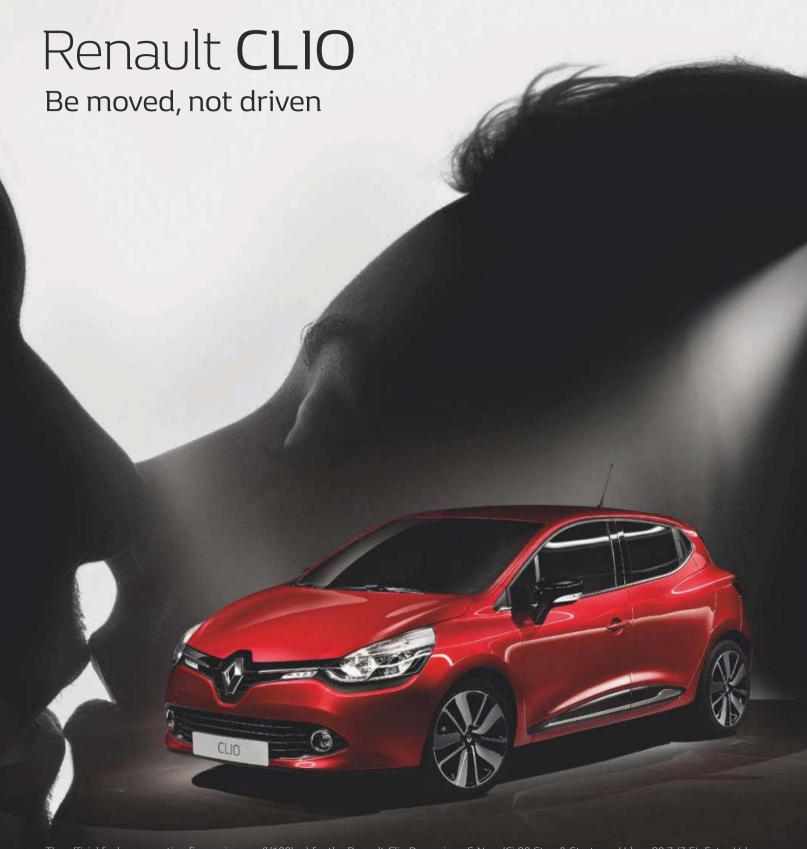

especially in the morning.

'She'd do with a different face.'

The Jake Bugg we know sings like a chipmunk, slags off The X Factor and strums an acoustic guitar like he's in a skiffle band. The new Jake Bugg takes influence from hip hop, slags off Noel Gallagher and even tries his hand at rapping. Jordan Bassett meets a man in the middle of a personal revolution

Photography: Dean Chalkley

AKE BUGG IS NOT READY for his close-up. Arriving in a whitewashed West London photo studio for his cover shoot, he shakes hands (surprisingly firmly), then disappears into make-up for what seems like decades. When he finally emerges, he slips into a white and purple tie-dve jacket that his stylist worries, in hushed tones, looks "a bit new-rave". Bugg seems at ease being photographed (he should be he recently signed to model agency Elite) and he looks quite serene with his eyes closed, waiting patiently while an assistant teases a single strand of hair.

Bugg, who turned 22 on Sunday, has a reputation for acting like a spoiled teenager – unsurprising given he was just 19 when he released his debut album. Profilers tend to find him disengaged. "It can feel like badgering a sullen nephew about how school is going," wrote one. This is not the Jake Bugg that NME spends an afternoon with – in his first interview for a year he responds to questions at length and even cracks the odd ioke.

And that's not the only recent transformation. Forthcoming album 'On My One' – due for release on June 17 – is no retread of his first two. Sure, it has folk songs designed to appease Bugg purists – the swaggering 'Put Out The Fire', the finger-pickin' ballad 'All That' – but there's experimentation, too. There are two hip-hop tracks: 'Gimme The Love', a big, beaty juggernaut of a song, and 'Ain't No Rhyme', in which he does something that sounds suspiciously like rapping. Elsewhere, a strain of lush, '70s-style pop runs through the record. In short, Jake Bugg has taken some real creative risks.

WORK on the album began in early 2015 in the disparate locales of Malibu and Nottingham. It was reported last year that Mike D from Beastie Boys was working on material with him in the former, though none of it has made the cut. "He was doing a track of mine," confirms Bugg, back in the dressing room after the shoot. "But I still haven't bloody got it back yet. Do you know what it's called? 'Waiting'. Can you believe that? Can you fking believe it? It's like fking taking the ps."

Bugg and Mike D - real name Mike

Diamond – spent "a couple of weeks" together, first in a studio in Malibu, then round Diamond's gaff, but the California lifestyle wasn't exactly conducive to productivity. "Everyone's so relaxed in Malibu," he says. "It was like, 'Oh yeah I'll be there at 12, man'. Three o'clock, he turns up. But I'm the same. Mike hadn't done anything for a while so I think he was just getting back into it, finding himself again. The important thing was he inspired me to go back to Nottingham and use what I'd learned. So even though nothing physical came out of the experience, it definitely played a part in what I came up with later."

The influence is clear on 'Gimme The Love', the album's first official single, and also 'Ain't No Rhyme' - that rap song. Bugg, who claims he "can't rap for st", recorded his version as a rough guide, with the intention of finding an actual rapper to re-record it, but "we couldn't find anyone in time so [the label] decided to use my version. If they think it's alright to use, fair enough."

Bugg has spoken before about his hip-hop influences, gleaned from childhood friends who were into first-wave grime artists such as Wiley and Dizzee Rascal. He was more into '90s East Coast rap at the time ("I never liked much British rap, chord with me") and now rates contemporary acts Run The Jewels and Joey Bada$$. He's followed the recent resurgence of grime, spearheaded by the likes of Skepta and Stormzy, but is only half-impressed. "I feel like a lot of the time it is the same stories," he says. "It's violence and guns and drugs. I like listening to it 'cause usually it's true. But a few more stories our conversation, Bugg oscillates between talking to the table and remembering to make eye contact. The effort this entails is quite sweet. One person who will not enjoy the balm of this Jake Bugg charm offensive is Noel Gallagher. The ex-Oasis leader took Bugg on a US tour with him in 2012, but later said he was "fking heartbroken" to learn that the seemingly credible musician co-wrote 2012 debut 'Jake Bugg' and 2013 follow-up 'Shangri La' with hit-makers such as lain Archer, formerly of Snow Patrol.

"Noel's last album is pretty cp, though, innit?" says Bugg. "Put that in. I'm not upset about it because it's just Noel he'll slag off Ed Sheeran and be at a party with him the next week, like. It's just the way he is. He was definitely an influence on my music, but I don't care what anyone says, man. I'm just doing music the way I wanna do it."

would be cool." THROUGHOUT

Whether or not Noel's words stung, 'On My One' finds Bugg going it alone. Named after Nottingham slang for 'on my own', it sees him writing all of his own material and producing much of it, too. He was not, he insists, hell-bent on silencing his critics: "People are probably gonna say I was trying to prove a point or something, but it was more for me. It was important for my development as a writer. If I don't do it now, when am I gonna do it?"

It's a risky move, and Bugg's record label, Mercury, were nervous. "I think all the way through the process of making the album they were still unsure, until it was finished and then they were like, 'Oh, OK, it's not as bad as we thought it was gonna be," he says. Bugg now compares his cowriting days to a further education course: "My mates were going to college to learn plastering and joinery and I was going to work with these professional songwriters, so I thought: 'Free education'. You know, people pay top dollar to go to all the top schools. didn't have to, I was lucky. went and learnt it, and now I'm doing it by myself."

BORN into a workingclass household in Clifton, Nottingham, his father a nurse and his mother in sales, Bugg must know what kind of life would have awaited him had fame not beckoned. He agrees that the Tory government is not that sympathetic to young people. Around the General Election last May, he took an online test to establish his political views. The result? Liberal Democrat.

"Coming from a working-class background, if you didn't go left, you'd be resented," he says. "But after having a few albums and touring a while, maybe financially it's better to be right wing. So you're stuck in the middle. And that's kinda what 'Ain't Know Rhyme' is about. The lyrics go: 'You can't just wind up the dividing screen/ When you're in the middle, which side do you lean?' It's kind of how I felt. People are always trying to pull you to one side."

Fame hasn't distanced him from his old mates. He brings them on tour, though he acknowledges it must be tough for them to return to Clifton afterwards. "You might not have seen your best mates for a bit but you have that instant connection again straight away," he says. "Like with my mate Jaz - you see each other and you can just sit there and not have to say anything because you get on so well. You can have a bit of a laugh or chill and watch TV and st like that."

Bugg now rents a house in West London while looking to buy a place in the city, and today he performed at a Burberry catwalk show. He admits to feeling some guilt about his success. "I go into a shop and I'm like: 'I want that now.' I walk out thinking: 'Fking hell, my mates have probably been grafting all week just to buy a beer'. People might like the songs and it might be successful, but does that mean you should have a vaster amount of money than somebody that works 45 hours a week? I don't think so. Not when I'm getting to enjoy myself. It doesn't seem fair somehow. People might go: 'Well, why don't you give your money away then?' But even if you do that you can never keep everybody happy."

Bugg entered the gossip pages in 2013 when it was reported that he was dating posh supermodel Cara Delevingne, and that she chucked him in April of that year. Actually, he says, the whole thing was a tabloid fabrication. "We were just coming out of a venue. People take pictures and, like, create a story around it. It's like, that's not evidence is it? That's two people hanging out."

Bugg didn't enjoy that kind of attention. "My spotlight is on the stage," he says. "For me, that's the real spotlight. People flashing cameras in my face, I don't care about that st.'

ONE thing Jake Bugg does care about is whether or not you buy his album. "You wanna do this job forever, don't you?" he says. "So it's make or break. If it flops, who's gonna buy the fourth record? That's why I had to give it everything. That's what [title track] 'On My One' is about: 'I'm a poor boy from Nottingham/ I had all my dreams/ But in this world they're gone'. My dreams have come true, but that's what I'd be singing if I lost everything."

The stakes are high. In a world where Adele's '25' can sound just like '19' and '21' and still be the biggest-selling album of the decade, you might have forgiven Bugg for attempting to repeat the formula of his 650,000-selling debut. Was he tempted? "Absolutely not," he says. "People don't know what they want. I'm sure if Adele would've been a bit experimental, it might've got a bit more mixed reviews but if it was good, people would still love it 'cause it's still her. If I did the same things people would go, 'Oh, it's just the same', but if you do something different, they go, 'Oh, it's not like his other two albums'.

"I wanted 'On My One' to be different. I feel like people are too scared now to do something different."

So the kid from Clifton has released a rap song. Respect.

Bugg on the box

The many times Jake's music has popped up on telly

'Trouble Town' serves as the theme tune for the hard-hitting BBC1 crime drama set in West Yorkshire.

Jake released 'Lightning Bolt' in 2012, just as Jamaican sprinter Usain Bolt became the star of the Games. The result? Wall-to-wall Bugg.

Lena Dunham used 'There's A Beast And We All Feed It' for series three of her HBO comedy drama. It played as three characters cavorted through a graveyard.

The teen weepie featured 'Simple As This'. We need a kiss and a Bugg just thinking about it.

After dismissing talent shows, Bugg performed 'Me and You' on America's biggest one. Awks.

Last month, the music world mourned the loss of promising indie band Viola Beach, who died alongside their manager in a car crash in Stockholm. Those close to the Warrington four-piece tell Barry Nicolson they'll remember them for their humour, energy and ambition

Kris onstage at London's Village Underground last November

he history of rock 'n' roll is littered with untimely deaths, but few have seemed so monstrously unfair as those of Viola Beach and their manager Craig Tarry. The young band's nascent career was cruelly cut short when their car crashed into a canal on the journey back from a Swedish music festival in the early hours of Saturday, February 13. In the weeks since the tragic event, the indie community has rallied around the Warrington four-piece, with everyone from Liam Gallagher to The Stone Roses to Kasabian expressing support for the successful campaign to get their debut single, 'Swings & Waterslides', into the charts. Yet for the people who knew them best that show of unity can never be anything but bittersweet: here was a band who might have achieved anything, yet whose memory will always be defined by a single, tragic twist of fate.

"The music industry can be quite an unforgiving place," says the band's agent, who asked not to be named in this piece, "but when a massive tragedy like this happens it really resonates, and that's been lovely for the families to see. But there's also the understanding that there was a promise to this band that was so, so immense. I have absolutely no doubt whatsoever where Viola Beach were going."

Among the first to recognise that promise were Adrian Hall and Lee McCarthy, who comprise the production duo Sugar House. Hall and McCarthy discovered Viola Beach on Soundcloud in early 2014, and over the next 18 months recorded five separate sessions with the band at their studio in St Helens. McCarthy remembers them as being, "Different to a lot of other bands we'd met. They were a bit off the wall, but they weren't contrived. You could tell there was definitely something there, especially when you sat with Kris [Leonard, frontman] and listened to him talk about music. It wasn't like they were," agrees Hall. "Tomas [Lowe, bass], Kris and Jack [Dakin, drums] all worked in the same bar, and they spent a lot of time drinking together and having a laugh, which was a big part of their dynamic. I remember Jack arriving at the studio one day with a load of new tattoos, because he'd just bought himself a tattoo gun. Kris would turn up wearing girl's pants, or dungarees, or a NASA jacket, and when you asked him about it, he'd say, 'I woke up this morning and they were touching my legs, so I just put them on.' They didn't care, and that's why it worked - because they weren't trying."

Irreverence was a big part of Viola Beach's charm, but the absence of that "big plan" was initially what held them back: the songs were there, but the line-up was always in flux, with Leonard and drummer Dakin the only constants. It was when Craig Tarry came on board as manager in early 2015, says McCarthy, "that they really got their act together and everything clicked into gear. They needed someone to hold their hand and help them function like a real band."

group of young men who were only just dipping their toes. Cruel, cruel world." BLOSSOMS "We'll never forget them. Their tunes forever in our heads; Craig, Kris, Jack, River and Tom always in our hearts."

Instrumental to building that momentum was BBC Radio Merseyside's Dave Monks, who gave the band their first radio play and invited them onto his show for numerous live sessions throughout 2015. Monks responded not only to the "energy and freshness" of Viola Beach's songs, but also the band members' > individual personalities. "You couldn't help but like them as people," he says. "They were funny, polite, enthusiastic and ambitious - especially Kris, who was the ideas man."

With Tarry as manager, bassist Tomas and guitarist River Reeves solidified the line-up in May 2015. Viola Beach released 'Swings & Waterslides' through their own label, Fuller Beans, which subsequently led to major-label interest and a deal with Communion Records. In August, at Dave Monks' behest, the band were added to the bill on the BBC Introducing stage at last year's Reading & Leeds festivals, and their performances there led to another milestone - their first UK tour, supporting London alt-folkers Eliza and the Bear.

'We met them on the first night of the tour in Manchester. You could see the excitement in their eyes," says frontman James Kellegher. "We'd got them a bottle of Jack Daniel's and they first thing they said was, 'Do we have to drink it all now?' They were young and super-keen and completely untainted by the industry. Everything was a pleasure for them." Joining them on that tour were Scottish group The life," agrees their agent. "Kris used to message me saying he wanted to break the record for playing the most gigs in a year. He'd say, 'I want to be known as that band who gig and gig and gig, and who make fans everywhere they go."

LaFontaines, whose guitarist lain Findlay recalls the band being "Stupidly excited about going out on their first tour."

"They had a really weird, beautiful outlook on

"They wanted to break the record for playing the most gigs in a year"

In 2016, the band were already booked to play SXSW, Latitude and Live at Leeds, with further appearances at Glastonbury and a return to Reading & Leeds being negotiated and a support tour for on-the-up indie band Blossoms. There was also a five or six-track EP. recorded with Communion co-founder and producer lan Grimble, scheduled for release later this year. When NME reached out to Grimble, he confirmed there were currently no plans to release anything, but the band's agent doesn't completely rule out the possibility.

"The team around Viola Beach will sit down with the families once the funerals have taken place, and we'll work out how best to proceed," he says. "Whether that's making an album internally for the families or an album that actually gets released, I don't know. There's a lot of music, a lot of demos, a lot of amazing songs, and it'd be great if it got out, but at the moment, everybody's still grieving. We need to sit down and work out what we do with it."

Viola Beach's legacy may now be out of their own hands, but that doesn't necessarily mean the last word on them has been written.

Their KOKO date was on January 29 - ■ one of their last gigs > but Låpsley fills her songs with distinctive flourishes. 'Painter' is embellished with delicate glockenspiel, while 'Heartless' sparks into life with a glitchy vocal hook.

Several songs seem guest male singer, but to feature a guest male singer, but it's actually Låpsley cleverly shifting the pitch of her own voice. Even without studio trickery, her voice is a versatile instrument – capable of both Adele-style stridency on 'Hurt Me' and 'Love Is Blind' and a delicate breathiness with echoes of Dusty Springfield on 'Painter'.

Her lyrics document the toll recording sessions in London and LA – where she worked with The xx and Savages producer Rodaidh

McDonald – took on her relationship. She confronts her fickleness on the mournfully minimal 'Station', bemoans a lack of communication on the glossier 'Operator (He Doesn't Call Me)' and finds herself "anticipatin' heartbreak" on the gorgeously sad ballad 'Hurt Me'. 'Tell Me The Truth' features a looped refrain that's devastating because it's so conversational: "Just tell me the truth/It'll hurt less, I guess".

At 47 minutes, 'Long Way Home' may seem lengthy for a debut, but it feels cohesive without boxing Låpsley into a limited sound. With '80s-style drum fills, epic choruses and up-tempo disco coexisting so comfortably, album two already feels like a tantalising prospect. Hopefully, by then Låpsley won't feel so underestimated because on this evidence her talent speaks for itself. Nick Levine

FOR FANS OF

The once-placid electropoppers tackle police brutality and fear for the future on their third album

record was made
while vocalist Channy Leaneagh was heavily pregnant with her first child (that's her baby bump on the cover) and, even though it's not necessarily about motherhood, the experience has clearly had a hand in shaping it.

Their frontwoman's changing circumstances meant the Minneapolis synth-pop five-piece approached this record as if it were their last - and one of its recurring themes is Leaneagh's anxiety over the sort of world she's bringing her child into. It's a concern that's present from the very first line of the very first song 'Summer Please', which finds her wondering "Whatcha wanna be when you're big enough to see it's all sh*t" - a question that probably doesn't get asked very much on Mumsnet.

By far the most striking manifestation of that angst, however, is found on latest single 'Wedding', the video for which features Leaneagh and a group of Hensonesque muppets explaining police brutality to an audience of smiling black schoolchildren. Poliça tend to deal more in artful subtleties than big, eye-catching Beyoncé-at-the-Super-Bowl statements, but even without the context of the video, lyrics like:

"Every voice is like a click/Trigger after trigger/We don't even know we're sick/ Leaders, we have none" leave little doubt what the song's about.

That directness is a welcome addition to the music, too – previously, Leaneagh's voice has often been obscured by producer Ryan Olson's penchant for Auto-Tune and digital manipulation, but it's left mostly untouched on tracks like 'Baby Sucks' and 'Kind' and is all the more effective for it.

Unsurprisingly, Leaneagh's hopes, fears and anxieties define 'United Crushers'.

However, the rest of the band – particularly Olson, whose work with experimental side-projects Gayngs, Digitata and Marijuana Deathsquads has made him one of the most compelling (and confounding) musical polymaths out there – also deserve a lot of credit, not least for the punchy stadium hip-hop stylings of 'Top Coat' and discombobulating polyrhythms of 'Berlin'.

If this really is Poliça's "final paper" (as Leaneagh's called it), then they've excelled themselves with the most intimate and empowering album of their career. Barry Nicolson

xx Channy Leaneagh's mournful voice and Ryan Olson's downtempo production have won Poliça numerous comparisons to Portishead, but it's The xx's stately debut that 'United Crushers' is most reminiscent of.

Psych!

The Coral used to be amazing. Then they got a bit boring. Now they're amazing again

THE CORAL Distance Inbetween SWIRLY NOISY MOODY

THIRTEEN YEARS ago, after the release of their self-titled debut and its swift follow-up 'Magic And Medicine', The Coral really meant something.

The Wirral scallies stood out with their technical brilliance, unique take on the psychedelia sound and their ability to write an absolute banger - in 'Dreaming Of You' they had one of the most effortlessly brilliant pop songs of the early '00s. They and The Libertines were the faces of the British indie boom that followed The Strokes and The White Stripes.

By 2004 their magic had begun to fade and there was nothing especially mind-mangling about the four albums they released in the next six years - 'Nightfreak

> And The Sons of Becker', 'The Invisible Invasion', 'Roots & Echoes' and 'Butterfly House'.

In the middle of all this, a chief architect of their sound, Bill Ryder-

Jones, left the band and it seemed reasonable to start worrying

Pete Doherty once claimed in an interview that he and Libertines bandmate Carl Barat wrote 'Dreaming Of You' and sold it to The Coral. He was fibbing.

When an "indefinite hiatus" was announced in 2012, and an album of lost songs ('The Curse Of Love') came two years later, the end seemed nigh.

Not so! The Coral are back. and the big question everyone's asking is: can they reclaim their kaleidoscopic crowns?

In their favour is a moodier and more rhythmic approach, with all the hooks that once made them great. There are highlights galore.

Now in his mid-30s, frontman James Skelly is still growling out lines such as "Ooh she's a mover/ as she moves in and out of time" on the brilliant 'Miss Fortune'.

First single 'Chasing The Tail of a Dream' is a psych-rock belter with a banging beat courtesy of James's brother lan. There's a Paul Molloy guitar solo in 'Million Eyes' that sounds like early Syd Barrett-era Pink Floyd.

Other standouts include 'Holy Revelation' and 'Fear Machine', which wouldn't sound out of place on the soundtrack to HBO's new homage to '70s rock, Vinyl. Closing track 'End Credits' is a ghostly sea shanty that recalls their early weirdness.

'Distance Inbetween' is a cohesive, imaginative psych-rock record that grows with every listen. Welcome back, boys. Charlotte Gunn HAIL, CAESAR!

15 Josh Brolin, George Clooney, Alden Ehrenreich, Scarlett Johansson

JOEL AND ETHAN Cohen's love of Hollywood's Golden Age runs deep. From 1991's Los Angeles screenwriter drama Barton Fink to 2001's noir pastiche The Man Who Wasn't There, these brothers wear their old school influences proudly. In the lavish Hail, Caesar! they get to fully indulge their passion for the early 1950s MGM era of cinema, covering everything from camp musicals and snippy romantic dramas to classic cowboy capers and epic historical films.

The story charts an action-packed 24 hours in the life of Capitol Pictures executive Eddie Mannix, played with 'tache and trenchcoat sporting panache by Josh Brolin. The No Country For Old Men actor isn't the only Coen brothers favourite reeled out in the A-list cast. George Clooney sparkles as an easily suggestible alcoholic leading man, offering up some of his finest physical comedy since O Brother, Where Art Thou?; Scarlett Johansson plays a femme fatale with a hefty Brooklyn accent, a string of broken mobster marriages and a knack for swimming; and Frances McDormand's blink-and-you'll-

STRNEETRIE

This is the second time real life studio exec Eddie Mannix has made it to the sliver screen - Bob Hoskins played him in 2006's Hollywoodland.

(Blue Jasmine), Magic Mike hunk Channing Tatum and British icon Tilda Swinton. Ehrenreich's dim, country-fried singing cowboy has speech impediment issues lovingly lifted from Singin' In The Rain; Tatum's tap-dancing Gene Kelly clone's sailor-themed song and dance routine 'No Dames' is a spectacular show of high-gloss campery; and Swinton excels as a pair of highly-strung gossip columnist twins.

Yet it's not just the perfect cast that makes Hail, Caesar! such a fully-formed delight the set design, costumes and locations are seriously sexy too. A beachfront home that rivals the John Lautner-designed

The Big Lebowski is particularly stunning, while the super-slick outfits rival 1997's similarly periodpitched LA Confidential.

Funny, flashy and fast-paced, Hail, Caesar! is proof not only of the Coen Brothers' effortless command of some of the most important actors in modern cinema, but their commitment to creating and crafting a wholly believable - and endlessly gleeful vision of the past. Leonie Cooper

Cate Blanchett gives a career-best performance as a journalist torn apart by a vital mistake

TRUTH

15 Cate Blanchett, Robert Redford

IN A JUST WORLD, ONE FREE of arcane rules and fine print, Cate Blanchett would have been battling herself in this year's Best Actress Oscar category. Yet for now it's disallowed for anyone to be nominated twice in the same category in the big awards ceremonies, so Blanchett campaigned for Carol (released last November) while Truth was quietly shoved into the shadows. It's a shame, as while it's not the work of art that Carol is, Truth, a riveting watch in itself, features one of Blanchett's best performances.

Based on fact, Truth has Blanchett as Mary Mapes, a producer on 60 Minutes, the American news magazine show. In 2004, Mapes and Dan Rather (Robert Redford), a journalistslash-national treasure, headed an investigation that guestioned the military record of then President George W. Bush. They alleged that he had not completed basic training and used family connections to avoid fighting in Vietnam. After the episode detailing the allegations aired, Mapes' sources were challenged and the whole story began to disintegrate.

This isn't a film about journalists snapping at the heels of power. It's not an All The President's Men or a Spotlight. It's a film about how in modern media the truth becomes secondary to the best narrative. Mapes is a woman fighting against rivals who turn her mistakes into the story and bosses who value business interests over the national interest.

Cate Blanchett: searching for the truth

Blanchett plays Mapes as a woman torn every which way, furious that she has fallen short of her own journalistic standards, but astonished that an error in their case has made the whole thing, in the eyes of the rest of the world, a fiction.

The Amazing Spider-Man 2 director James Vandebilt's film is at its best when sticking with the story and following Mapes at work. Showing her at home with a gentle husband and giving a back story of a cruel father to try and explain her is unnecessary. You get the full portrait of the woman when she's doing her job. If you manage to nab Cate Blanchett for a part you don't need to force a human-interest angle. She'll tell the story for you, no sensationalism required.

Sci-fi goes gangster

Stars of new E4 comedy drama The Aliens, Michael Socha and Michaela Coel, plus writer Fintan Ryan, take us inside the show that's rewriting the rules of sci-fi

THE ALIENS

Tuesday, 9pm, E4 Michael Socha, Michaela Coel

GANGS EXTRATERRESTRIALS

THE EXTRATERRESTRIALS IN The Aliens aren't little green men. They don't have gills or a third eye, and they aren't triple-breasted. They're ordinary-looking types who landed on earth 40 years ago. "There aren't many differences between the aliens and humans," says This is England's Michael Socha, who plays lead character

Lewis in the six-episode series. "The aliens have just got bigger dicks."

The Aliens is a radical reimagining of the sci-fi genre, beyond giving its menfolk big bulges. It's from the same team that created Misfits and shares with that superheroes-with-ASBOs show a desire to bring sci-fi bang up to date. The extraterrestrials are an allegory for modern-day refugees disinfected, tagged and kept in quarantine in a ghetto called Troy, only let out to clean the humans' loos. Socha's Lewis works as a security guard on the border of Troy. Like most humans, he doesn't like the aliens much. But there's a snag. He is one. "Humans have been taught to not like aliens; Lewis finds them disgusting," Socha says. "But then Lewis finds out he is half alien and his whole world falls apart."

The Aliens is not simply social satire. Writer Fintan Ryan, who also wrote BBC Three's In The Flesh, wanted to create a British crime drama that was more Breaking Bad than The Bill. He came up with the idea of Troy, a police no-go zone. Then came the concept of alien fur being a precious illegal commodity that, he says, "is a narcotic for humans". Its very existence creates in-fighting within the alien community. Into this melee lands Lewis, drawn into Troy to rescue his drug-dealing sister and becoming embroiled in gang warfare. The situation is complicated by his infatuation with female alien Lilyhot. Played by Chewing Gum writer and star Michaela Coel, she is a lone, terrifically violent woman in a predominantly male criminal underground. "Lilyhot is fighting for power in a world dominated by men," says Coel. "She's in a low-level gang but it's small game for her. She just kills and moves on."

Cute aliens, it seems, went out with E.T.. "A lot of them are nasty bastards," says Ryan. Sci-fi's about to get gangster. Colin Crummy

YOU HEARD IT HERE FIRST

Votners A folky American four-piece whose debut album doubles as a counseller or Kristine Leschper, the ex-visual arts student who fronts Georgia's Mothers, songwriting is a way of working out the big life questions. Mothers' mesmerising debut album 'When You Walk A Long Distance You Are Tired' puts those queries into intricate, twisted folk-rock with a math-rock edge. "The things I have questions about, I know other people have those same questions," Leschper explains over the phone. "I think that makes them easier to deal with."

In the same way that Mothers' debut is intended as a kind of support group for listeners, the process of forming the band - with Matthew Anderegg (drums), Drew Kirby (guitar) and Patrick Morales (bass) - worked similar magic for Leschper. Originally a solo artist, the self-taught guitarist

Leschper's past studies feed into Mothers in every way, from her songwriting process to the group's name, which is taken from an old art project. "I was really interested in animal nesting behaviour," she says. "Female rabbits pull out their fur so they can make a nest for their young. I was interested in those sacrifices and how they could correspond with sacrificing yourself for art."

It's not hard to identify Leschper's own sacrifices in Mothers' debut album. Every lyric she sings seems fuelled by some very personal feeling or experience. Torn out of herself, just like rabbits' fur, they're relinquished for the sake of art and music. Join the self-help group now. Rhian Daly

GOUNGUACK OF MY-Life

Alison Brie

How To Be Single actress and Trudy from Mad Men

The first album I bought MADONNA

Like A Praver

"I remember my sister and I performed the song 'Like A Prayer' at a talent show with some of our friends. We lip-synced and did a dance routine. Looking back, we were probably too young to be performing that song! I remember watching the video and thinking, 'Wow, I don't really understand what's going on, but it looks so cool!"

The song that makes me want to dance

DAVID BOWIE

Young Americans

"There's just something about the beat of this song. I have distinct memories of being in high school and discovering the music of David Bowie with a friend of mine. It was around the same time I was discovering pot, so we'd smoke a little, then dance around her bedroom to David Bowie."

The song I can no longer listen to

HANSON MMMBop

"I remember jokingly being into Hanson with a friend of mine when we were kids. I don't know if we were being totally ironic, though - we actually kind of liked them. But recently I was shooting a mini-series called Doctor Thorne and there was a guy who looked like one of Hanson, so I started singing 'MMMBop', and I was thinking to myself, 'What a ridiculous song! The whole chorus is made up of not-real words."

The song I can't get out of my head TAYLOR SWIFT

Bad Blood

"It's weird, because I don't actually own this song. But at random times I'll just start hearing it in my head. I'll hear it on a Tuesday, then on Friday morning I'll find myself singing it as I'm getting dressed. I guess Taylor knows how to write a song that really sticks."

The song I want played at my funeral

DAVID BOWIE

Oh! You Pretty Things "It's a great song - kind of reflective but not too depressing, which is perfect. I wouldn't want a really happy song at my funeral. It would be like I'm reaching back from my grave going, 'Ha! Now you have to listen to this happy song even though you're really depressed!"

The song I wish I'd written

THE BEATLES

"My dad's a musician and he writes songs all the time, but it's never been a gift of mine. I'm OK with that, though. But if I'd written a song, I'd want it to be something as pretty and sweet as 'Julia'. It reminds me of the ballads my father writes."

The song I do at karaoke LABELLE

Lady Marmalade

"I like to do it solo, and I definitely prefer the original version. One time I mistakenly signed on for the Christina Aguilera version and Lil' Kim has this whole rapping section. I just had no idea what to do, it was my ultimate karaoke nightmare."

The song that makes me cry NINA SIMONE

The Other Woman

"If I'm on my way to an emotional audition, this is the song I'll put on in my car. It just makes me break down in floods of tears every time I listen to it."
